In the 18th century, the mathematician Euler (prouncned "oil-er") tackled the problem of the seven bridges of Königsburg (now a city in Russia by the name Kaliningrad). The problem posed was whether, given the geography of the city with its seven bridges, one could take a walk that included crossing each bridge exactly once.